

This chapter presents the results of the ecological footprint calculations that were carried out in Catalonia and Andorra between 1996 and 2008. Both calculations showed that their respective development models were deeply unsustainable and that their tendencies were negative. Some thoughts on the role of the sustainability indicators applied in both countries are presented, including a discussion on what may happen if unsustainable trends are ignored.